Pravda Rules Out Talks If U.S. Missiles Remain

MOSCOW Pravde said Friday that U.S. nuclear missiles being prepared for deployment in Europe would have to be withdrawn before Soviet negotiators would resume talks on the issue

An editorial in the Communist Party paper appeared to have been prepared to rebut suggestions by President Ronald Resgan and other Western leaders that the Kremim, which broke off talks last week, would eventually roturn to the table in General without concessions from the West.

The editorial did not mention Mr. Reagan. Instead it focused on remarks by Chancellor Helmut Kohl of West Germany, who cited a message from the Soviet leader. Yuri Y. Andropov, after the breakup of the Geneva talks as an indica-tion that the Krendin might soon resume the negotiations.

"This, support of fine par shameless deception, Pravda

The editorial went on to quash mbiguity on the matter that arose from the wording of Mr. Andro. pow's statement on the missile estion last week. It added: "Nothing clas was said and could be said either to Chancellor Helmut Kohi or to anybody else. Apparently, some people are in trouble, if they decided to distort and make a subject of shameless speculation an exchange of mes-sages at the highest level. But this trick will not ease their position. rather it will further undermine trust in them on the part of their peoples and the world public."

Soviet determination to take a tough line on the issue, at least for the time being was underlined when officials announced a news conference on Monday by Marshal Nikolai V. Ogarkov, chief of the general staff. The announcement said that Marshal Ogatkov would speak on the missile question along with two high-ranking civilian offi-cials, Georgi M. # Unemployment In U.S. Falls to A 2-Year Low

By Jane Seaberry

WASHINGTON - The U.S. civilian unemployment rate plunged four-tenths of a percentage point to 8.4 percent last month, providing largest two-month drop since 1958 and the highest 12-month growth in employment since 1949, the Labor Department reported Friday. It was the lowest unemployment rate in two years.

Economists have been predicting that the drop in the unemployment rate would begin to level off as the economic recovery matured. Hawever, they have been surprised two months in a row as the unemployment rate dropped from 9.3 percent in September to 8.8 percent in October and then to the November

The drop in October was attributed to a puzzling decline of 553,000 in the size of the labor force. However, the decline in November was the result of an increase of 740,000 new jobs while the labor force grew at a more nor-

The unexpected drop in unemployment reflected the surprisingly robust growth in output during the past two quarters. The increase in the gross national product during the third quarter was 7.7 percent, far above original forecasts.

"Clearly the recovery in the la-bor market is sharp and sustained, the economy is strong and the over-all outlook for the future is very hright," said Raymond J. Donovan, the secretary of labor. "I am especially pleased that the job increase in November was so widespread and that the improvement was shared by almost all worker

Washington Post Service BELHING - The authorities in Beijing have begun a campaign to eliminate the last unregis-tered dogs in the capital and its suburbs.

After Thursday, all dogs without a special regis-tration will be killed by police, and their keepers will be fined up to $50. The ban limits legal ownership of dogs to foreigners, police, scientific researchers, the military, acrobatic troupes and restaurants that specialize in dog meat dishes.

China's national cabinet launched the crackdown in October to protect city sanitation and saleguard against rables. Dog owners were given a grace period ending Thursday to take their dogs to the countryside or to have them destroyed.

NEW YORK - Scientists exploring in northern Kenya have found the 17-million-year-old remains of an apelike creature formerly thought to have existed only in Asia. The researchers theorize that the primate may prove to be one of the common ancestors of bumans and the great apes. Examinations of bone fragments of the chimpanzee-size primate, which weighed 120 to 150 pounds (54 to 68 kilograms), indicate that it was similar in appearance to an ape, with a short face like that of an Orangutan.

Because the remnants were discovered only a few months ago, confirmation that the new specimen is an ancestor of apes and humans awaits the discovery of more specimens "and a lot of work in studying them," said Alan Walk-er, a Johns Hopkins University paleontologist who is a co-leader of the expedition.

The discovery was made by a team headed by Mr. Walker and Richard E. Leakey, director of the National Museums of Kenya.

Mr. Walker, in a telephone intermeeting to include discussion on view, said the newly discovered admitting Spain and Portugal to specimen was believed to be Sirathe 10-nation body. The discovery also suggests that Sivapithecus may not have been merely a specialized Asian ape related closely to orangutans, but may have been a more generalized ancestral form that gave rise to all the apes and humans that evolved later. Mr. Walker said a part of the

like creature. Preliminary dating of the fossils was done by the potassium-argon process, in which the rate of decay of potassium in the bones indicated the age of the specimen as being 16 million to 18 million years. The dating was supported by the finding of other fossils nearby whose age had already been determined.

The discovery of the primate places a possible common ancestor of apes and humans a little higher on the tree of lineage of great apes and Homo sapiens than had been previously reported.

Three years ago a team of scientists found fossils of a monkeylike primate that inhabited Africa 30 million years ago. This primate was named Aegyptopithecus. It is believed to be the oldest primate-apehuman evolutionary link that has so far been found.

The question of what the earliest human ancestor was, and accompanying questions of when the great apes and burnans split apart in the evolutionary process, have been among the most puzzling problems in paleontology.

The line of descent of apes and man is believed by most paleontologists to have split some time between 20 million and five million years ago. At that point, the primi-

Weinberger Says Soviet May Resume Talks Soon

By Fred Hiart

PARIS — U.S. Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger told an audience of foreign affairs ex-perts here Friday that he expects the Soviet Union to resume negotiations soon on limiting medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe. "perbaps in a matter of months,"

But Mr. Weinberger expressed reservations about the ment of merging those talks with the negotiations on intercontinental nuclear missiles, a strategy that many Europeans have suggested to hring the Russians back to the table. While not ruling out such a merger, Mr. Weinberger said it would blur the distinctions between two very different types of weapons and would be fruitless in any case unless Moscow changed its basic attitude on the European missile problem.

"I don't see any particular advantage at this time to merging the negotiations," he said.

Mr. Weinberger also said that the cruise missiles that the United States began deploying in Italy and England last month are "subject to an increasingly effective defense,"

The Soviet Union walked out of the Geneva talks oo limiting inter-mediate-range missiles in Europe wheo deployment began in three West European countries. Both the deployment and the walkout had been predicted if no agreement were reached in Geneva and, despite European anxieties about the current state of affairs, Mr. Weinberger said he is not discouraged.

"I believe right now that the prospects for a successful negotiatioo are better than they've ever been before," be said, while acknowledgiog that his optimism might not reflect the current "majority view."

Mr. Weinberger had predicted at least six months ago that deployment would have to begin showing the Soviet Unioo that the Western alliance was committed to fielding the weapons, before substantive negotiations could take place. By Hedrick Smith New York Times Service

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State George P. Shultz has raised the possibility that be might meet with the Soviet foreign minister, Andrei A. Gromyko, at an East-West conference on disarmament n Stockholm on Jan. 17.

Several West European nations, especially West Germany, have been urging that the 35-nation conference on the theme of developing safeguards against surprise attacks be opened at the foreign minister level. Mr. Shultz indicated he would not resist that effort, although he declined to say specifically that he would meet with his Soviet counterpart.

The Signals on Salvador

Depending on what hour you read the news. here is what the White House has been communicating about El Salvador: It wants rightwing forces to cease their murderous assaults on innocents. ... It wants Congress to stop demanding that American aid be conditioned on human rights progress. . . . It wants a free election next spring to legitimize government in El Salvador. . . . It wants all to know that Roberto d'Aubuisson, the idol of the death squads and nominal winner last year, should not win again.

But what all this signals is more trouble about Salvador with Congress and another propaganda gift to Salvadoran extremists. As the White House complains, it has been onerous for President Reagan to have to certify twice a year that El Salvador's government is improving its human rights record. Worse, since these certifications have been a foregone conclusion, the process demanded by Congress has been largely a sham. Yet by insisting on this tenuous string on aid. Congress was able to send useful signals of its doubts about U.S. policy and concern for its victims.

Now, instead of addressing these doubts. Mr. Reagan has ignored them and killed the latest bill requiring his certification of Salvadoran performance. He did it by pocket veto - withholding his signature while Congress is in recess, a form that requires no reasoned message. The action was not only disdainful but also imprudent, for the administration

Equally dismaying is the White House's apparent disregard of Secretary of State George Shultz, who was to bring coherence to Central American policy. He was evidently overruled earlier this week when the administration denied visas to Mr. d'Aubuisson and to Tómas Borge Martinez of Nicaragua. That timid and discrediting gesture was meant to signal a "balanced" suspicion about Nicaragua's recent overtures and Mr. d'Aubuisson's search for greater respectability.

But what that combination signaled was contempt for both North American tradition and Latin American history. Both men should have been admitted so that American audiences could judge their characters and beliefs. When the Kissinger commission visited El Salvador, its encounter with Mr. d'Aubuisson so shook the members that their recoil contributed to the administration's decision finally to speak out against the death squads' outrages.

The merits aside, these clumsy snubs may only strengthen the Latin leaders that Washington most fears. Nationalism can easily triumph over other interests when the Colossus of the North bears down so hard on southern neighbors. Mr. d'Aubuisson's ARENA Party and Mr. Borge's Sandinists are already entrenched with their publics. A few more such misguided signals could well

Who's Afraid of Borge?

In denying an entry visa to Tomas Borge Martinez, one of the Nicaraguan revolution's top leaders, the Reagan administration lonks weak and foolish. The impression cast is that it believes its Nicaragua policy is ton flimsy to stand up against the questions and criticisms that a qualified Nicaraguan might put to it. Otherwise there would be no reason to prevent the American people from sizing up Mr. Bor-ge's words and making up their own minds, So what if, as officials say, be wanted to come not primarily for talks with the adminis-tration but for a "propaganda tour"? If that was so unbearable, why not engage him in nonstop talks? Can no official see the absurdity of demanding, under threat of arms, that the Sandinists open up Nicaraguan society while the American government in limited but crucial respects closes its own? Did the Grenada experience make the administration feel it could safely circumscribe free discussion of public issues, first by limiting access of the press and now by exploiting its visa power?

The Borge denial came on the same day a visa was refused to Roberto d'Aubuisson of El Salvador, a flaming rightist. The pairing allows the administration to assume a pose of ostentatious evenhandedness. But the Reaganites bave it all wrong. Mr. d'Aubuisson may be Mr. Death Squad. He is also the elected leader. chosen in elections the administration landed to the skies, of El Salvador's acting legislature, and he may yet be chosen president next year in elections that Washington is counting on to help it escape the morass. In any event, those American citizens who cared to hear his views firsthand are losing the opportunity to do so. No less than in the Borge case, the adminis-tration, in barring Mr. d'Aubuisson, betrays a misunderstanding of the American democratic process and a measure of contempt for the American people. For these acts, Mr. Reagan will be depicted throughout Latin America as an uncertain and cynical leader, and he will

Feldstein in the Dock

Last year the White House was looking for a good conservative economist to bead the president's Coincil of Economic Advisers. Well, it found one. Now, a year later, the same White House is wild to get rid of him.

As chairman of the council, Martin Feldstein has been found guilty of two grave offenses. He has remembered what the president said in the last budget about taxes, and, worse, be keeps talking about it. Mr. Feldstein also faces pending charges of baving engaged in logical reasoning in a public place and having committed various acts of independent economic analysis. the white House political people must be especially eager to get Mr. Feldstein off the premises before the election-year budget is published a couple of months hence. Mr. Feldstein thinks that the $200-billion federal deficit is dangerous, and he keeps bringing it np. In last January's budget. President Reagan proposed increases in both income taxes and oil taxes, contingent on various conditions. It was never very serious, but the idea was there, and Mr. Feldstein keeps noting it as evidence that Mr. Reagan would favor, under certain circumstances, higher taxes.

That is a matter of some substantial embarrassment to Mr. Reagan and his political managers. He is preparing to run for re-elec--tion as the man who cut Americans' taxes. But he does not want to disavow the contingent tax explicitly, since that tax belps the administra-tion, in its published projections, to show a deficit decline in the later 1980s. Those projections all assume that the tax is about to go into effect: But without further legislation, as Mr. Feldstein has repeatedly noted, the administration's own figures show the deficit remain-ing at $200 billion for the rest of the decade. Mr. Feldstein believes that there is a relationship between big deficits and high interest rates. His critics, who are numerous and not far from his office, jeer and ask him to explain why interest rates fell last year while the deficit as rising. But have interest rate fallen - real interest rates? Why is it that the interest on long-term triple-A debt was 3 percentage points over the inflation rate when Mr. Reagan took office but is now 7 points over the inflation rate?

Mr. Feldstein is conducting himself as though there were still choices open in tax and budget policy for the next two years. That is wrong. All the ehoices have vanished. Mr. Reagan has decided that there is nothing be can do before the election. The strategy is to try to blame everything on Congress, to call loudly but vaguely for unspecified spending cuts, and to hope hard that interest rates do not go up any further before November 1984.

Crackdown in Bangladesh

Lieutenant General Hussain Muhammed Ershad, military ruler of Bangladesb, bas clamped down hard after the riots that have cost at least six lives in the past few days. The Soviet Union has been told to haive the size of us diplomatic mission and to close its cultural center in Dhaka. All of which is no great inconvenience to the Russians, who will still maintain by far the largest representation in Dhaka, if you add in the nondiolomatic staff.

It will go also down well in Washington But General Ershad is facing the most difficult period in the political life cycle as it has emerged in both Bangladesh and in Pakistan. It is the run-up to the point at which military rule is relaxed prior to a shift toward democracy. The wheel takes another turn. General Ershad will survive this spin. He may make it through the elections. But only an optimist in Washington could argue that he has broken the vicious circle of Bangladeshi politics.

In Lebanon, Muscle-Bound America Can Only Watch

BEIRUT - If you had been D made to memorize Shelley's poetry, fragments would come back as you stop to stare at what is left of the U.S. Marine compound out at the airport. "Two vast and trunkless legs of stone stand in the desert." Shelley wrote of the "colossal wreck" of the memorial to Ozymandias. Two erect pillars hold up the reinforced concrete slab of what was the marine compound's first floor; the rest lies to one side in collected piles of rubble. "My name is Ozymandias, king of kings: Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair." Shelley's lines send a message to American practitioners of geopolitics.

The raw military strength on display here is undeniably mighty—the battleship New Jersey lying in sight offshore, the aircraft carriers just over the horizon, the supersonic jets and smart missiles. Far out of sight, but never out of mind, are missiles with nuclear warbeads,

But also never out of mind is a Soviet-backed adversary, similarly armed, with its own Middle East clients, agents and interests. The restraints thus imposed on terrorist attacks - alongside the evasive explanations from the Reagan administration for why there was no comparable U.S. response. Asked about that, an Israeli Army officer encountered in southern Lebanon plays on a familiar line of Richard Nixon's. "You are a helpless giant," the Israeli said. "You can't move a muscle."

That's it. For the job at hand in Lebanon — with all the bomegrown complexities, passions and conflicts of purpose and interest — the United States is muscle-bound.

The point is lost in the easy scapegoating for the calamity at the compound. The French, after all, were hit the same day. The Israelis, no strangers to terrorism, were subsequently victimized in the same way. With fresh earthworks piling up around the marines' position, the new commander, Brigadier General Jim Joy, is "confident there will be no repeat of the last bombing." But he does not "guarantee" anything. By contrast, the Italian contin-gent in the multinational peacekeeping force moves easily through the Sabra and Chatila refugee camps, scenes of last year's massaeres. The Italians and the French are welcome in the way the marines once were - as peacekeepers.

The welcome for the marines, am told, turned to cold stares in Moslem communities as the Reagan administration increasingly came to be identified with the interests of the government of President Amin Gemayel and, by extension, the Christian side of the sectarian strife.

For further evidence of isolation, try to visit the American diplomats crowded into British Embassy facilines since the deadly bomb explo-sion that destroyed the U.S. Embassy in April.

Right after the marine compound was terror-bombed, the popular, heavily used road between the British Embassy and the sea was shut off completely by U.S. tanks and barbed wire. The result is a substantial to the sea was shut of the sea wa tial contribution to Beirut's paralyzing traffic jams, "How's that for winning hearts and minds?" says one U.S. official.

The United States comes across as muscle-bound physically. It is muscle-bound mentally as well, by now in Lebanon; when you are the huge discrepancy between the stakes that Ronald Reagan has attached to Lebanon and what the United States can effectively do.
"I'd love to hit the Syrians hard across a long front," says an American diplomat, "Once we had their attention ..." — at which point the line of thought gives way to reality and quite a different pre-scription. "Only an accumulation of pressures is going to do the job." That prescription also has its problems. Neither the instinational peacekeeping partners nor the Israelis are all that eager to remain indefinitely in some Lebanese foxbole for freedom, caught up in a Ronald Reagan crusade against communism in the Middle East.

Still less do the Jordanians, the Gulf states or even Lebanon's President Gemayel share the Reagan administration's fixation with the Syrian-Soviet connection. For better or worse, they have to share the neighheap of history" speech, with its col-orful phrases pouring scorn on the Soviel system, struck home in Mos cow. Eighteen months later, it still rankles. Whether it did any good is another question.

Take part in a discussion in the Kremlin and, as the compass needle unswervingly seeks the magnetie north, so will the conversation veer automatically to the dire state of U.S.-Soviet relations. The Russians do not say that it is utterly impossible to do political business with the Reagan administration, but it is made clear that although private exchanges can and do take place. little business of real importance is transacted.

Can this deadlock be broken? I argued in Moscow that it must be, for nuclear world is too dangerous for the superpowers to be shouting so loudly that they cannot hear each other speak.

As a committed supporter of the Atlantic alliance, I assume that the present U.S. administration would be willing to play its part in reaching understandings that are acceptable to both sides. If this should not be true, then the consequences will be as serious for the alliance as for U.S.-Soviet. relations. A growing number of young people in Europe would argue passionately - but mistakenly that there would be nothing to choose between the two sides. And the biggest arms race in history would gather momentum, wasting resources that the United States could devote to better purposes.

What animates increasing numbers of Europeans is not so much increased fear of the Soviet Union as increased fear of nuclear war itself, 1 hope the policy-makers in Washington clearly grasp the implications.

Moscow, meanwhile, has discarded the arguments advanced 40 years ago by Soviet theoreticians that war between capitalism and communism is inevitable. They acknowledge that the present confrontation is highly dangerous, but not hopeless. I heard it argued that it resembles the events that led to World War I, by which I assumed it was meant that war could spread through a chain reaction, perbaps starting in some smaller country and eventually engulfing us all.

But their main point is that this can be forestalled by a joint drive toward some order in the world, instead of toward a zero-hour clash. This would require an understanding of what is acceptable behavior by each side.

Underlying the argumentation is an unshakable belief that the United States must deal with the Soviet Union as an equal on world problems. I trust that no one in authority believes seriously that the Soviet Union can be driven to submission either by economic sanctions or by an arms race. East-West differences on such issues as human rights and the treatment of dissidents will remain and should be strongly expressed:

A Neutral, Unified Germany Could Help

WASHINGTON — Chancellor Helmut Kohl apparently is not impressed by his parliamentary majority in favor of missile deployment. After denouncing the opposition for weakness in the face of the Soviet Union, be now seeks to take not as many but as few of the weapons as possible. A 19th-century statesman declared that one can do everything with bayonets except sit on them. The same. Mr. Kohl is discovering, is true of missiles. The argument between the government and opposition, to be sure, is not about missiles; it is about Germany's future, and the lines are far more blurred than the government's arithmetic victory suggests. At one with its Soviet counterpart. the American foreign policy elite denies that anything could or should change in Central Europe. However, the West German peace movement and its increasingly audible East Ger-man echo are slowly undermining the superpowers' eertainties. In both Germanys, the peace movements voice national goals that, sooner or later, governments will have to espouse - or they will disappear. In "The Day After," the television drama depicting the effects of nuclear war in the Kansas City area, troubles in East Germany triggered the superpower confrontation. The danger is not confined to TV: In 1953, the Soviet Army suppressed a popular uprising. Recently, the regime has exiled some dissident writers and Protestant peace activists. It cannot, of course, exile a substantial segment of its population.

Astonishingly, its official party newspaper, Neues Deutschland, recently published two letters from Protestant clergymen warning against stationing Soviet missiles in East Germany. This unprecedented gesture suggests that some Commu nist leaders also think nationally.

I find it ironic and profoundly sad that Jack Nelson's article (IHT, Nov. 22) on the fact that the United States paid reporters' fares to Grenada, and on the decision by the U.S. Information Agency to follow Mr. Reagan's lead in describing the U.S. invesion of Grenada as a "rescue mission." coincided with your back-page article on George Orwell, who, in 1984. coined the word "newspeak."

In one, Federal District Judge Consuelo Marshall issued an injunction in Los Angeles blocking the Reagan administration's plan to sell oil-drilling rights on 900,000 acres of offshore land between Point Conception and Morro, Bay: The udge said she agreed with the California Coastal Commission — which groups eight city governments and 22 environmental groups — that the sale of drilling rights would "cause great loss and irreparable damage" to the state and its people.

By David S. Broder

W ASHINGTON — Sometimes You get a better clue as to what is really happening in the U.S. government by noting the little stories in the papers than by focusing on the big ones. Let me give you some examples, tucked away in a single day's edition of The Washington Post Dennis Cox, an official in the compliance section of the Internal Reven pliance section of the Internal Revenue Service, told the National Economists Club that the government failed to collect at least $81 billion of taxes it was owed in 1981. Almost all of the "tax gap," Mr. Cox said, can be blamed on individual taxpayers who understate or conceal their meome, rather than on corporations. Why? "Corporations don't have much of a tax gap any more" he said "because

Most of that reducion came in the Reagan cra, thanks to generous terms of the tax bill he pushed through Congress in 1981. According so the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, the effective federal taxinate for usajor corporations fell from 21.8 percent in 1980 to 17.2 percent in 1981 and 16.1 percent in 1982.

The 16-percent rate paid by the typical major corporation is the same as the tax rate levied on the wage-camer in, a family of four with an income of $11,900 to $16,000 a year.

The second story was about an exchange of correspondence between the civilian bosses at the Pentagon

For Sean Connery, a Rousing Return to Bondage

Sean Connery as 007 in his new movie.

ARIS — The triumph is total. "Never Say Never Again," with Sean Connery playing James Bond for the first time in 12 years, is a great hit, cutting the legs from under Roger Moore's rival Bond film. "Octopussy," and Connery has been dutifully plugging it in Australia, Japan, the United States, Spain, France, Monte Carlo, Britain, the Netherlands and Italy.

He first played Bond in 1962: The film une "Dr. No."

He first played Bond in 1962; The film was "Dr. No." I just found out that when 'Dr. No' went to Japan, they translated it as 'No Need for Any Doctors,' " Connery remarked over coffee after a round on the St. Cloud golf course with his wife, Micheline.

"To think that in 1983 we're still talking about the James Bond character," he added. The words "James Bond character" suggest the distance he has always felt but was not encouraged to express. "Sean Connery IS James Bond." the ads said, and no one bothered to think that for Connery it was just another role.

Before Bond, he worked on the stage and on television played Vronsky to Claire Bloom's Anna Karenma. He had also made eight films (his partners included Lana Turner and Martine Carol), and while this wasn't bad going for a relatively untrained actor who had started out as a chorus boy in "South Pacific," he was not a star. Then came the smooth 007, which for the rough-hewn Scot was a dialect role. "Most of my actor friends knew it wasn't ideal casting," Connery has said. It turned out to be.

The French liked the Bond pictures from the start. In England, Connery says, The Times and The Guardian liked "Dr. No" and the popular press didn't. In North America, the films were not the financial blockbusters they sometimes seemed to be, "Until now for every dollar the Bond films made in the U.S. and Canada, they made $2 outside. A film like 'Private Benjamin' made more in the U.S. than a Bond film,"

Connery says. "Never Say Never Again" has changed that.

Connery's non-Bond films have never equaled the Bonds in commercial success but they have shown unusual courage and range on his part. He has done political melodrama ("The Molly Magnires"), a Hitchcock ("Marnie") and science fiction ("Zardoz"): He has played a poet in a screwball comedy ("A Fine Madness"), a Kipling soldier ("The Man Who Would Be King") and an aging Robin Hood in "Robin and Marian," an inaccurately romantic title demanded by the picture's

"It was supposed to be called The Death of Robin Hood," but Americans don't like a hero who dies or anything that might smack of not being a victory." The film, which co-starred Audrey Hepburn, is now a cult picture, Connery says.

Connery's return to the Bond role has left film students shaken and stirred: his other work is being re-evaluated and retrospectives have been scheduled at the Paris Cinémathèque and at the National Film Theater in London. The result is that he is at last accepted as a fine film

"During the 1960s, Connery as an actor was rarely talked of in the same breath as contemporary rising stars such as Albert Finney. Terence Stamp, Michael Caine, Richard Harris and Robert Shaw," Neil Sinyard writes in the National Film Theater program. "Yet for consistency and development, his career has subsequently surpassed them all."

Connery is a shrewd and affable man, proud without conceit. "I've been making pictures for nearly 30 years," he says, "There have been a Int of failures but I haven't come out with anything really bad, so I must be doing something right." Independent and when necessary flinty, he has never taken any nonsense from producers and early in his career had the gall to sue film mogul Jack Warner for $50,000 and win.

His tiffs with producers Harry Saltzman and Albert Broccoli became part of the Bond legend. Asked what the success of his new Bond picture will do for his career, his reply is swift and smiling. "I don't know, maybe there's a little sweetness of revenge on Broccoli." Their working relationship ended in 1971.

His decision to return to Bond may have been in part financial (it is said he will not over $5 million) or it may have been the need to show that, at 53, he still has the magic.

"I had done the homework for the first nne, then it was a case of ducking and diving in the rule ever since. It's something that you have in accept, that there's an enormous public for it.

"Someone said to me. Where would you have gone if the film had bombed?' Furtunately, I didn't have in think of that, though I've had a few films that have."

The success of "Never Say Never Again" could suggest that, like it or not. Connery is at his best as Bond. It's not a view that Connery could live with: He is not about to disown any of his pictures any more than he would change any part of the way he's lived life. "It's like an alpaca sweater, you pull one thread and it all comes apart," he says.

Connery lives in Marbella, Spain, within reach of several golf courses, but remains an ardent Scot. He founded the Scottish International Education Trust with the $1-million salary he extorted from Broccoli for "Diamonds Are Forever" and he talks with lucid rage about Scotland's unemployment rate. He was born in an Edinhurgh slum started work at 9 and left school at 13.

He has been working now for more than 40 years and doesn't intend to stop. "I couldn't dn that, really," he says, "I enjoy the excitement of working on a well-crewed and exciting picture. It's like a microcosm of a society that really works, because nothing works anywhere else. It's the best time for me.

It is harder to make a picture properly these days, he says, because there are so few real producers left (his producer on "Never Say Never Again." he says, unfortunately turned out not to be one of them).

"There are very few genuine-article producers around. It's all commit-tee decisions, which means it's very difficult to find the culprit. So many of the office committees that are making decisions have never been near a film. For them it's all accounts, it's all briefs. So when someone's been put there to make the decisions, with the domino factor something's got

For "Never Say Never Again" Connery was heavily involved in the production and exacted approval on east, director and script. The first to be cast were the villains, Max von Sydow and Klaus Maria Brandauer, who had scored a great success in "Mephisto." "From that we got the general pitch and caliber of the film," Connery said. He had already worked with the veteran director, Irvin Kershner, "He's American, I knew I could keep the British element." The production designer was Stephen Grimes and the distinguished Douglas Slocombe did the product, which they don't do much anymore. They go into special effects." Comparing his Bond picture with the rival "Octopussy." Connery says, "Roger and I differ in our playing, They open with a marvelnus sequence that could take place in Nicaragua but it doesn't relate to the story. They have good visual gags and stunts. We wanted ours more in the vein of 'From Russia With Love' — strong character and humor based in credibility."

In the new (ilm, Bond's boss, "M" (Edward Fox), is a cranky bureaucrat, younger than 007. The CIA man, Felix Leiter, is black Bond, says Connery. "is older and. I like to think, a wee bit wiser." He plays Bond with his own Scots accent and detached charm. As an actor he tends to be rocklike and self-contained: The Bond role obliges him to be quicksilver and extrovert and it gives him a chance to show that he moves better than anyone else in the business.

There is every reason to believe Connery when he says he really will never play Bond again. But as the armorer "Q" (Alec McCowen), who makes Bond's lethal devices, says in the film, welcoming him back to a world that has become hureaucratic and gray: "Good to see you, Mr. Bond. It's nice to get back to a little gratuitnus sex and violence again."

Galbraith, the Undismal Scientist | An Irreverent Focus on Japan

by Bob Hagerty

ONDON - In his wry memoirs, John Kenneth: Galbraith: wrote that as a young expression professor be feared that my superiority would not be recognized The media thave worsed. As the author of 24 books, many of them best-sellers, it economists, even though his ideas are currently out of fashion in Washington.

"I'm reasonably satisfied with the public response to what I've written." Galbraith said in an interview here between lectures. "Economics, after all, is not pomography."

At age 75, the retired Harvard professor seems reasonably satisfied in general. He is still an imposing figure, though he walks with a stoop, his gray suit hanging on his 6-foot-8-inch (2-meter-tall) frame. As for his health, he says, "Never better — always including the fact that I have a slight cold."

Galbraith talks as if he were writing. He pauses lengthily before crafting a sentence, ualting in midsentence; skipping back a few words and making a minor emendation. His best lines sound like echoes from an old Galbraith essay. Some of them are.

Impromptu debate has never been his strength; he is better at writing. He has written economic tomes, notably "The Affluent Society" and "The New Industrial State," arguing, among other themes, that big government is necessary to keep big business and big labor from running amok. He has written of travels, power, his Scottish forebears and Indian paintmg. He has even turned out two novels.

In all of his writings, Galbraith has refused to assume the solemnity normally expected in what Thomas Carlyle called economics — the dismal science. So successful has been this aberration in economic writing that some of his more conservative colleagues dismiss his work as lightweight. Almost pornographic, some would say.

"In general," Galbraith responds, carving out another aphorism, "economists have reviewed economic ideas with excessive solemnity and insufficient appreciation of the absurd." Resisting such errors, Galbraith plans to write over the next couple of years a history of

"Not a history of economic ideas, but a history of the subject," he explains. "The ideas have always been assumed in economics to have a life of their own. I'm going to try and show that economics as a subject has been a byproduct in some ways of the history of economic life itself, including to a very considerable extent an effort to rationalize whatever was most convenient to believe." So what are economists rationalizing these Galbraith is ready for the question. "Nothing is so wonderful as the discovery of American Republicans of the virtues of the

After years of coming into office with prayerful obcisance to the balanced budget and the condemnation of John Maynard Keynes as the most mimical figure since Karl Marx, the Reagan administration is carefully explaining that deficits are unimportant and that under no circumstances must we worry about them." He takes a sip of coffee, a lock of gray hair drifting toward his right cyebrow. "It's a marvelous example of accommodating economic ideas to

The Reagan administration's tax-cutting policy, Galbraith charges, sprang from a need to reward the wealthy voters who elected Reagan. "This involved a particular difficulty," Galbraith says. You can be concerned for the poor, but you're not allowed to be concerned in politics for the rich, and so a new idea was developed."

The idea was supply-side economics, "based broadly on the theory that the rich were not working because they had too httle money and the poor were not working because they had too much money."

Ridiculing Republicans comes easily to the author of "Annals of an Abiding Liberal," a man who was in charge of price controls under President Roosevelt during World War II and served as ambassador to India under President

When it comes to foreign policy, the professor has been known to part company with both major parties. He is writing a new introduction to "The Triumph," his 1968 novel that mocked what he regarded as U.S. meddling in Central America. The book is being reissued, Galbrauth says, "to prove how little we've learned in 15

A new novel is in prospect. It concerns a man who writes a perfect computer model of the economy, gets rich, turns out to be a socialist and wrecks the free enterprise system. "I worked this out in my mind, and I'm going to do it someday."
He long ago abandoned plans to publish a novel drawing on his experiences campaigning for Democratic presidential candidates. "An election campaign in the United States is a thing of Tolstoyan breadth. About the time I finished the novel, I reached the conclusion

Like him, however, Galbraith has definite literary tastes. He is a "passionate supporter" of Anthony Trollope and admires Evelyn Waugh. "I think I've learned more about writing from Evelyn Waugh than anybody else—a man of appalling social views but an absolute master of the language."

Somerset Maugham is greatly underrated, Galbraith feels. "If I had to say who was the most overrated English writer of the last century," he adds, "it would be Thomas Hardy, who's an awful bore."

These days, Galbraith has more time for reading. He abides as a liberal and supports the nuclear freeze movement. He lectures, but he will not campaign against Reagan next year. "Anything I can do to help bring the Resgan administration to an end I will do — short of making speeches."

Galbraith has never been one in shun publicity. "I've always had a certain tendency to keep my virtues before the public," he admits. Even so, he does not seem to lament his passing into the sidelines of politics.

There comes an age when you have to leave the active campaigning to people of the relevant generation," he says. "So far as I know, the only virtue of old age is that one isn't compelled to go out and make political speech-

OKYO - Visitors in search of local culture usually visit the shrines, look over the kimonos and sample the sake. They would also do well to pick up a copy of Focus magazine, the spirited Japanese picture weekly. Focus, which recently celebrated its second birthday, is a wicked mix of irreverent photographs and impish text — a Japanese blend of Paris-Match and People with a dash of the National Enquirer.

The weekly blend includes pictures of courtroom cases, flood disasters, porno-film queens and the Princess of Wales. The magazine has offered its audience a glimpse of a drunken Kakue Tanaka, Japan's former prime minister, visiting a geisha house. A recent coup was a full-page photograph of Takanosato, the massive sumo star, astride a minihike en route to the apartment of a love interest, a petite Japan Air Lines stewardess.

The most talked-about magazine in Japan. Focus has emerged as a minor cultural phenomenon. With close to 1.5 million copies sold each week. Focus is more popular than any other Japanese publication except Manga. comic books that usually depict violent love scenes and sell between 2 million and 3 million copies a week.

In a nation where magazines appeal to narrow and specific groups of readers, Focus, which was originally targeted at men in their 30s, is read by nearly everyone, from businessmen to har hostesses to schoolchildren.

Japan's age of leisure and affluence has touched off a magazine boom that has seen close to 600 new publications launched in the last three years. But with its large pictures, uncluttered layout and glossy paper. Focus looks unlike any Japanese magazine before it. Its air-hrushed covers by a popular artist, Kazo Miyo, were also a radical change: smiling schoolgirls and film stars are standard on covers of most Japanese weeklies. Focus's brittle, sophisticated text was another break with tradition, as were its slender size (68 pages) and low price (150 yen - about 60 cents).

Several highly unimaginative imitators have aiready appeared, including one clumsy vul-garity called Sexy Focus. (Focus has sued, saying the name is too similar.) Far more interesting are the cosmetic changes that established Japanese magazines have undergone. Dozens are aping the Focus look and style, most notably staid Shukan Asahi, a 61-year-nid weekly published by the Asahi Shimbun newspaper company, which had been losing

Focus has also heightened competition for photographs, driving up prices. Apparently no expense is spared when the subject is deemed worthy: Focus posted a photographer at Tokyo's elegant Hotel Okura for a week to snap a female politician's clandestine visits to the suite of her lover.

Not surprisingly, the magazine's contents have frequently raised questions of taste. A photograph of a prominent politician relieving himself in the garden of Japan's Diet, or parliament, set off protests by his constituents.

Media observers here tend to link propriety with percentages - all should be well as long as Focus balances its questionable materia with wholesome shots of cherry blossoms, works of art and the emperor.

It is precisely this mix that seems to hold Focus's readers.

"In a country like this, where people work very hard, Focus provides the bubble gum," says Bernard Krisher, a former Newsweek correspondent who is a special adviser to Focus. Even those who avoid the magazine admit it has a certain appeal. "I don't buy Focus, because I can live without that kind of content," says Yasuko Kamiizumi, a Tokyo secretary. "But if someone gives me a copy, I'll look at it. And if the pictures are shocking, I'll read

ALERMO, Sicily — It was supposed to be a nonworking vacation in Sicily. Forget npera, concert and symphony. Instead, concentrate on pasta and the local wines. Ruins and mosaics. Churches and monasteries. Driving here and there. Walking among the ruins left by the Greek and Norman and Spanish and Mootish settlers, who for millennia had made Sicily the crossroads of the Mediterranean. Perching on a fallen pillar in a Greek pantheon, preferably at sunset or under the full moon, and thinking the appropriate

But the first stop was Palermo and, as I said to my wife on our arrival, Palermo after all has had a distinguished musical tradition and it would do no harm to look into it. Just a little look. A teeny-weeny look. Hey?

I also said this while driving to our hotel and getting lost. Some people have a sense of direc-tion. Others don't. But how can a music lover get mad at a city that has streets and squares with such names as Via A. Scarlatti (Alessandro Scarlatti was born in Palermo in 1660)? Or Piazza Verdi? Piazza Bellini? Via Alfredo Ca-talani (the composer of "La Wally")? Via Umberto Giordano (the composer of "Andrea Chenier")? In Palermo they even name streets after great singers of the past, as witness Via Mariano Stabile.

It so happened that, on the day we arrived. the Teatro Massimo was giving a performance of Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor." Who could miss a "Lucia" in Palermo? These days the Teatro Massimo is not playing in its own house in the Piazza Verdi. That has been closed for 10 years or so, pending renovation, Instead, performances are being given at the Politeama Garibaldi, another hig house, built in 1891 and originally designed for spectacles.

This "Lucia" was a performance, at 6:30

P.M., for children, and the place was thronged with kids, most of them accompanied by their parents. The Politeamo is an enormous huildng with an auditorium that seats only about 1,300. Between the acts, the kids rushed to the bars - ice cream bars, candy bars, soda-pop bars - and then dispersed in the restroom

During the performance they were very well-mannered. But once in a while, when their parents did not like the leading haritone, and vented their disapproval with whistles, the kids enthusiastically joined in. They also applauded and bravoed when their parents applauded and hravoed. These kids are being brought up right.

The performance was not bad. Indeed, it was provincial opera at its best, and certainly noth-

In this town, François Picart, a Frenchman, hopes to cultivate black truffles, ugly fungi but delicacies to gournets, who use them to flavor food. Picart says Dripping Springs, 30 miles (about 48 kilometers) west of Austin in central Texas, has much in common with the fields in the south of France that have long been the domain of the black truffle.

He says he scoured the United States for a suitable growing spot for the truffles before settling on the hill country and its welldrained, limestone-rich soil and adequate sum-

"I bked the name," the 36-year-old Picart says of the town, "Obvious!" the limestone is here. The hill country is a very beautiful place to live. And people are friendly."

In the summer of 1982, he sent soil samples to laboratories in France, which approved the . Texas dirt for truffle cultivation, he says.

Picart also spent a summer without air conditioning in hot, humid Austin to test the climate firsthand. "It wasn't too hot for me, so I figured it wasn't too hot for them," he says, speaking of truffles.

They grow underground, on the roots of hazelnut or oak trees. Difficult to harvest, they must be suffed out by trained pigs or dogs. Picart began by sprouting acorns to grow oak seedlings. The seedling roots then were injected with truffle mycelia, the vegetative part of fungi taken from their spores. The seedlings grow six to nine months in sterilized dirt before they are planted in the earth.

Another five to seven years pass before the tree forms a brule, or burned-ont circle, around its base to signal the presence of truffles. Picart will plant 30 acres (12 hectares) of oaks this year, with 250 trees to the acre. Allowing for trees that die, and based on a yield of a half-pound (227 grams) to four sells oak seedlings to other prospective growers and imports truffles from France to sell in the United States. His customers include the Neiman-Marcus specialty shops, which are selling his imported black truffles for Christmas. The price is $60 for a 14-ounce (45-gram) truffle, which Picart calls cheap. The market for truffles is already estab-

Malta Facing a Tourist Boycott

by Chris Scicluna

ALLETTA, Malta - Bird lovers and hunters on this Mediterranean island are involved in a feed that threatens the tourist trade. The bird lovers - the Ornithological Society - say that irresponsible hunters and trappers are stripping Malta of its wildlife, a charge the hunters deny.

The Ornithological Society is supported by foreign bird-lover organizations, which have demonstrated outside Maltese diplomatic missions in West Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium. These and other foreign groups are also warning of a tourist boycott of Malta.

The Maliese bird lovers say few birds breed here any longer and contend that many of those that stop by twice a year on migratory flights between Europe and Africa are shot by hunters.

The hunters and trappers — the Association of Shooters and Trappers - accuse the bird lovers of wanting to do away with all hunting on the

by Patricia Wells

ARIS - Le Divellec breezed into town just six weeks ago, and this bright and airy restaurant serving some of the freshest fish and seafood in France is enjoying instant success. It is no surprise, for Jacques and Micheline Le Divellec already have a strong following. Their former restaurant, La Pacha in La Rochelle, was awarded a second Michelin star in 1982.

Although many rough edges are still to be worked out here - particularly the often clum-sy and unprofessional service - there is no question that Le Divellec will grow to become one of Paris's finest fish restaurants. Chef Jacques Le Divellec is a jovial giant of a man, rumbling through the cool and contemporary blue and white restaurant, shaking hands, chatting in a most friendly manner. He seems to be having a great time and so are most of his Parisians have long been blessed with a fine and varied abundance of fresh fish and seafood, but I must admit, sampling Jacques Le Divellec's turbot, rouget, coquilles Saint-Jacques or bar is like tasting each for the first time. It's the kind of fish and seafood that's so remarkably fresh it sticks to your teeth, carrying the scent of the clean salt air.

The chef does not stop there; he has a creative spirit that's instantly appealing. His sublime black pasta — thick strips of mysterious, shimmering pasta flavored with squid ink — is one of the most bizarre and wonderful new dishes I have sampled in the last three years. This wild, rare pasta tasting gently of the sea is served with perfect, sautéed turbot in a golden chive-infused sance

Equally appealing are his braised whole bar, or sea bass, served with a green and white pasta - this one flecked with seaweed and grains of coarse sea salt — and the superb rouget. In each case, the fish is cooked to flaky perfection. As a first course, do try the unusual combination of foie gras and scallops: The cool coquilles Saint-Jacques are lightly marinated and thinly sliced, then paired with quickly seared fole gras, served warm. While the tex-

If you are looking for a model of simplicity, sample the refreshing lobster salad: just meely cooked homard, served at room temperature and surrounded by a bed of greens, not drowning in butter or heavy sauces that mask its hearty personality.

The oysters here are another story: One giant, meaty special is enough to make a whole meal. (You can be certain this is not the size of oyster Brillat-Savarin's friend ate when feasting on an appetizer of 32 dozen!) These mamparks in France, are unquestionably delicious, but I find them too much of a good thing, a pure case of gilding the lily. I hold with those who contend that, when it comes to oysters, bigger is not better. (And Le Divellec does its. prized oysters no favor by serving them with stale rye bread.)

Slightly less interesting are the first-course panaché de poissons, a light blend of greens and varied smoked fish, and the coquilles Saint-Jacques cuites à la vapeur, whole steamed scal-lops served from a small Chinese bamboo steamer. The scallop presentation is a fine idea. but the dish ends up being rather awkward to eat, as the shellfish are served with a large, accompanying soup bowl filled with dipping

When planning your meal, be sure to save room for a single dessert. Le Divellec's simple creative touch is at work again with the original and delicious soufflé au chocolat amer, actually a mint-green soufflé served in a shallow soup bowl. Tucked in the center is a generous, creamy mound of warm bitter chocolate, which slowly melts into the airy souffle mixture as it.

is consumed, with ultimate pleasure. Items from the rolling dessert cart are acceptable, but far from astonishing. And the presence of those pale orange, cardboard-flavored strawberries is a sad sign indeed.

With all this excellence in the kitchen, it is a-real shame that Le Divellec's dining room does not follow suit. While service is friendly and outgoing, it can also be slow, amateurish and to take your order. Wine service lags, and inevitably, opened wine bottles are placed out of reach of diners. Thus when service slows those who want to refresh glasses on their own are out of buck

Le Divellec's logistical problems are common to so many restaurants: The dining room is long and narrow, making it difficult for waiters, or even diners, to pass through the narrow siste. So why do they persist in using rolling carts for tableside preparations and desserts, when they only wreak havoc in the dining room? Waiters trip and stumble, service moth oysters, from some of the best oyster is interrupted and, in the end, everyone is Cheis must truly curse the day that the silver cloche came into fashion. While the shiny domes were originally designed to keep the food warm as it moved from kitchen to table. they have instead become a hackneyed vet obligatory badge of graciousness. Today almost no ambitious, self-respecting restaurant is withour them: Yet in reality the domes and up steaming the food rather than keeping it warm, waiters are always having to sneak a peek under the lids so they don't get the dishes confused, and when it comes time to remove the domes, there are never enough waiters around to perform the ritualistic unveiling.

At Le Divellee, waiters are obviously burdened by the hodgepodge of heavy domes (some are flar and sold-looking hospital-style lids, others are cloches of shiny silver) and so ill at ease with them, the diners in turn are made

Add to this the fact that the wine list is too narrow to be appealing, the pasty white air bread is a disgrace to the palate, and the management is somewhat greedily trying to squeeze too many tables into too small a space. Once these matters are ironed out, one will not only eat well, but also dine well at Le Diveller.

ing to be ashamed of. Alfonso Gubernati, the house manager, explained that Palermo tradi-tionally was host to young singers on their way up. And most of the singers were indeed young. It was a traditional staging, with costumes by Sir Peter Hall; and the acting was equally traditional, of the outstretched-arms school, the lurch and stagger, the back of the hand over the eyes to express great emotion.

We made arrangements to see what was going on at the old Massimo, and the following morning the house manager, Alceste Tagliar-ini, took us through the building, leading the way through totally dark corridors and backstage areas with a Dashlight

The Teatro Massimo, opened in 1897, is huge. Originally it contained 3,200 seats. Today the building is gutted, work is going on, and Tagliarini hopes that it will reopen in about three years at the equivalent of about $8.5 million. Only some 2,000 seats are planned. The pit also is being opened up, and will be able to take a Wagnerian orchestra.

But it will have some of the amenities of the original theater, including the royal box with its elaborate antechamber and private stairway. The Massimo is a horseshoe-shaped The murals on the ceiling will be restored, the statuary all over the place polished up, the marble cleaned, the exterior - now in shocking shape — repaired. This is a very classic building, with Corinthian pillars, a pediment with Greek masks on either side, and a big staircase leading to the building flanked on both sides by huge lions, on each of which a muse is comfortably seated.

In Palermo we fell in love with the mario-nettes in a tiny theater at 6 Viale Nicolo Ragusi. Il Teatro dei Pupi Ippogriffo, it is called, and it can seat about 75 on wooden benches. Not very comfortable, but the little place, with its colorful primitive curtains, its marionette models hanging on the wall (for sale), its provisions for musical accompaniment (an old music box and even older player piano, painted like a Sicilian wagon), makes you feel wonderfully at home. This theater is strictly a mom-and-pop affair, run by the same family for generations — a famiglia di puparo. Sicilian marionettes have long tradition, going back to medieval times. and usually the operation of a marionette theater passes from father to son. At this Teatro dei Pupi Ippogriffo, mom was at the box office. During the performance she synchronized the player piano with the stage action. Her sons were manipulating the puppets. Her grandson, a handsome 7-year-old named David, helped at the box office, turned the crank of the music box for the overture, and then disappeared backstage to help his big brothers and uncles operate the marionettes. He also could be heard as the Voice of an Angel during the harrowing scene when the hero went to heaven. Propped against the stage were signboards in English and German telling the action. The hourlong show was named "Death of Ruggiero. della Aquila Bianca." "Charlemagne sends Ruggiero to Rome. On the way he meets a dragon and kills him, then rescues Aladina, a lady being held captive by a giant, who intends to sell her as a slave. He kills the giant, whose soul is taken by a devil . . . " And so on through the adventures and eventual death of the young gallant Ruggiero of the White Eagle. All Sicilian mationette theaters seem to liane shows based on Charlemagne and his knights, and their battles with the Saracens. ..

When the curtain goes up, the illusion is extraordinary. Intellectually we know that these marionettes are no more than three feet tall, but they look life-size on the tiny stage, and the intellect is suspended. We believe in ance, ti blood. They wear armor, knightly regalia, regal clothing, brandish swords and spears and go clanking around the stage with great thumps. The backstage handlers were virtuosos. They even had Roggiero sheathing and unsheathing his sword, and that takes an awful lot of Sicilian marionette shows are great for batiles. Here was Ruggiero expertly dispatching a dragon, the poor beast (who never had a chance) expiring with a final sad, despairing twitch of its tail. Here is Ruggiero lopping off the head of a giant, said head landing about five feet away. Here is Ruggiero in battle with another knight, an epic example of swordplay not seen since Errol Flynn faced down Basil Rathbone in "Robin Hood." Such thrust and parry! Such noise! Such sounds of steel against steel! Such thuds and stamps from the backstage puppeteers! And finally Ruggiero splits his opponent's head in half. At which point the audience cheers. At marionette theaters the audience (largely made up of tourists) is part of the act, cheering the hero and hissing the vil-

During all this a stentorian voice from backstage narrated the action, in Italian, of course, If Ruggiero was Errol Flynn, the narrator was a cross between Lionel Barrymore and Charles Laughton, reciting in an orotund voice heavy

The background music was lovely, All of it, was salon stuff, mm-of-the-century inconsequentialities, some of it with a faint Italian flavor. So it did not have any Radeening Social Value, but it sure was fun. "The Adventures of Roland and the Rout of Roncesvalle." Here the synopsis was shorter. Roland kills giants, dragons "and many snakes." The Taominis manionette theater operates out of the Cine-Teatro S. Nicolò, off the Corso Umberto, and was founded in 1887 in Acircale by Mariano Pennisi. At his death, Emanuele Macri took over The Cine-Teatro San Nicolò is a real theater, seating abut 200, It had nowhere near the charm of the Ippogriffo. Nor was there any music:

Palermo had spoiled us. In Taormina they seemed only to be going through the motions, without the expertise and consecutive sweep of the Palermo puppeteers. Only one voice recited the action, so this was basically a pantomime a real play.

But one amusing thing happened at the Taormina performance. Roland's visor kept slipping down, covering his face. During one of the scene changes there was the sound of great backstage hammering. Somebody was trying-fix the errant visor. When the curtain went up, Roland and his knights were being received by Charlemagne, Roland's visor still kept slipping down. And every time it happened, Charle-magne gravely lifted his arm and pushed it up.

The best way to obtain tickets for the opera in Sicily, as elsewhere in Italy, is to ask the portiere, or concierge, of your hotel to telephone the box office a day or two ahead of time. Unless a superstar is singing, there is hardly ever any trouble in reserving seats. The price runs roughly from the equivalent of $10 to $25. The marionette theaters, though popular, never seem to be sold out. Just get to the box office about 15 minutes before a performance. Tickets cost about $3.

For more information, go to the tourist offices found in all the major cities on the island. There is one at the Palermo airport, but the main out it Palermo is the Azienda Autonoma Turismo, VIIla Igiea (tel: 540-141). # Christmas Shopping: London

by Vicky Elliott

cass through

ONDON - Christmas may come but once a year, but Christmas gifts are all too often duplicates. One way of making up for a congenital lack of spination is to exploit someone else's think-which isn't difficult to do in London. The Victoria and Albert Museum in South

Kensington (ick: 01-589-5070), for example, has a showcase of contemporary craftsmanship displaying the work of some of the most inven-tive of British jewelers, potters, weavers and ssblowers, each piece one of a kind

They start cheap, with Caroline Broadhead's yed nylon bracelets with silver clasps at £5.20 (about $7.80), and they end on the steep side with Wendy Ramshaw's hieratic silver and gold rings at up to £350. These look as if they might have been part of Tutankhamen's hoard and come with contoured Plexigles stands that turn into sculpture when the rings aren't being

There is pottery from some of the better-known kilns around the country (a big tempor by David Leach costs £69, for instance). More easily packed into an overnight travel bag or even a pocketbook, are some exquisite bookmarkers by Mary Restieaux in multicolored woven silk at £19 or £24

The craft shop's Christmas exhibition this year is "Tall Storeys," a zany collection of David Swift's concoctions in painted wood, including such classic extravaganzas as "The Ice Folly," a 33-inch (84-centimeter) wooden tower whose various levels are inhabited exclusively by penguins. (Prices from £25 to £400.)

Anatol Orient, whose shop of the same name (at 46 Cross Street, Islington, London N1, tel: 226-6863) lies not far from that well-known haunt of browsers for antiques, Camden Passage, likes ceramics. He has managed to assem-hle them in great profusion in the 15 months since his gallery opened. Some of the pots are (almost) two-dimensional and some refuse to hold water, but they are collector's pieces, and Anatol himself is eloquent in explaining how they have been made, using not only traditional slipware and glazes but such refinements as Japanese raku firing methods.

... There is also an inspiring selection of tex-tiles, including fiery hand-painted shawls reminiscent of Matisse, and some interesting quilted coverlets - hand-painted and hand-stitched — by Carola Fielden (£70 to £100), who will also paint whole rolls of furnishing fabric with her personal blobs and doodles. A series of colorful rugs made to a British design by a Tibetan cooperative in lower end of the spectrum, rainbowed mugs and bowls deporated with a kind of slipware filigree cost only a few pounds.

Back in the center of fown, in the territory of the Sloane Ranger, is Dragons (23 Walton Street, London SW3; tel: 589-3795 and 589-0548), which specializes in the painting of furniture for the discerning nursery. Tiny chairs in red, white or navy blue (£38) can be illustrated and name-plated to order by a choice of some 20 artists and shipped anywhere in the world. (Credit-card orders accept-

Sloane names like Emma and Henry and William are much in evidence on the stock at hand, and the pastels and florals may be 100 much for some, but Dragons has also secured the right to use Christopher Robin characters to decorate the toy chests (£105), the picture clocks (£55) and the jumbo bookshelves (£135) in white painted wood that are part of its master plan for the infant environment.

For the more progressive side, of British fashion, a new rendezvous for designers fresh out of art school is the gray and pink stalls of Hyper Hyper (26-40 Kensington High Street, London W8), which is easily spotted from the street by its rosy-pink caryands. The ground floor opened in September, and 30 more shops in the heavement of New 11, and on the sport in the basement on Nov. 11, and quite apart from the coffeehouse stationed at the back of the complex in an authentic Pullman wagon, this is worth visiting for a view of the latest in London talent.

Moods range from the Cruella de Vil black and purple velvet at Symphony of Shadows (blouses from £30 to £60), to the subdued and layered knirwear at Christian de Falbe (tel: 228 4066), all beige and angora and tagged with such reassuring information as: This garment was hand-knitted for you by Mrs. Blake-Thomas."

Pulling them in from all over the world: down by St. James's Palace, is rather a different sort of establishment, which caters both to the Prince of Wales and to fishermen from Finland to Ontario. The House of Hardy (61 Pall Mall, London SW1, tel: 839-5515) doesn't exactly deal in custom-made tackle, but the rods and reels it produces in its Northumber-land factory are individually tested and calibrated, as they have been since the business was established in 1872,

As well as the standard accourtements for both fly-fishing and coarse fishing (in tropical waters), including sproat books and sedge hooks and hook-sharpening stones (£1,95) Hardy's has telescopic gaffs (£34.80) and insect imitators and wader clasps (£3.40) that make the rubber tops hang downward, "ensuring perfect circulation of air

Smuggler rods (the 7-foot - about 2-meter one costs £75; the 91/2-foot one £107) can be packed away into a 15-inch cloth bag. Hardy's green canvas bags are popular with girlfnends (£18 for a trendy, if far from functional, small version with net ring) and photographers (£36 for a version with netting that is good for carrying film).

To finish just round the corner, with a far from unusual gift suggestion from a most singular purveyor, there is Berry Brothers and Rudd Ltd (3 St. James's Street, London SWIA IEG, tel: 930-1888 and 930-5331), a family that bought the lease from an Italian grocer in 1732. The shelves crowded with 17th-century bottles are there to prove it, if the oak paneling and sloping wooden floor weren't enough.

Then there is the room-high balance, outfitted with wooden seat and some mean-looking from weights. There isn't anywhere else in Londoo that can claim to have weighed Beau Brummel and Lord Byron — it became quite fashionable in Regency London to have one's weight registered in the leather-bound ledgers here. The Aga Khan, who would trot down the street from the Ritz in the 1920s, manifested a quite obsessive interest in charting the fluctuations of his person between 16 and 17 stone (or. if you prefer it that way 224 and 238 pounds).

As to the Christmas offerings Berry Brothers night offer, they include vintage port for laymg down at around £11 a bottle; vintage port for drinking—the 1966 ranges from £13 to £18 a bottle; sampling cases of Berry's Own Selec-tion of Red Wines (three bottles each of four French wines at £31) and the King's Ginger Liqueur, which was originally, at the request of Edward VII's doctor, "produced as a warm drink for His Majesty to take after winter mornings in his oew horseless carriage" and now costs £11.

Christmas is a good time to remember those who live where it is warmer and not so comfortable, and one way of doing something for them is to send a check to the Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind (Commonwealth House, Haywards Heath, England RH16 3AZ), which has helped a million people combat hlindness in developing countries in Afri-ca. Asia and the Caribbean during the last 12

The society undertakes 180,000 cataract operations each year, and as little as £4 will literally give sight back to a Bengali weaver or a Laotian cobbler. And £160 is enough to set up an "eye camp" in a village with no electricity, in which a surgical team can treat as many as

Spain's Palatial Public Library

by Mark Williams

ADRID - The virtues of Spain's monastery of San Lorenzo del Escorial are much dehated. While some visitors call it the "eighth wooder of the world," others speak in harsher terms - foreboding, frightening, a "granite and slate rectangular monster."

There is no doubt, however, about its power to overwhelm visitors. El Escorial has 16 courtyards or patios. 89 fountains, 86 staircases, 1.200 doors and 2.500 windows, and it houses nearly 2,000 paintings, murals and tapestries. But many people overlook its most fascinating aspect a library, rivaling the Vatican's in richness - that anyone can use.

El Escorial lies 30 miles (48 kilometers) northwest of Madrid, where the undulating plains meet the abrupt beights of the Sierra Guadarrama. its name means "the slag heap," as the spot once served as a dump for

In April 1563. Philip II, Spain's most ambitious monarch, laid the first stone of his monumental project, and the monastery was dedicated to San Lorenzo, on whose feast day Spaniards won a great victory over the French in 1557. The saint died a martyr's death, roasted alive by Moslem fanatics, and some imaginative observers have ooted El Escorial's resemblance to a gridiron, complete with handle.

The royal architect Juan Bautista de Toledo based his plans on Philip's dream of building a burial place for his father. Emperor Charles V. and a religious retreat for himself. Under the architect's successor. Juan de Herrera, plans blossomed to include a royal palace and cathedral. The mausoleum became a pantheon for the House of Austria, Spain's ruling family until 1713. Building was virtually completed by September 1584, a remarkably short time by the standards of the age.

Philip drew up plans for the Royal Library in 1564, just after work on the monastery had begun. A year later, the first lot arrived: 4.000 books from the king's personal collection, including the famous "Polyglot Bible" by Cardinal Cisneros (which featured Hebrew, Greek, Latin and Chaldaic translations), the "Codice Albeldense" (a 10th-century record of early Church Councils) and the king's own prayer book. The monarch soon persuaded others to donate their collections, and books and manuscripts poured in Among them were Queen Isabel's breviaries from the Royal Chapel in Granada, and even 139 books banned under the Spanish Inquisition, shipped under lock and key. There were also rare editions of Greek. Roman and Renaissance gems and masterpieces from nearly every language, including priceless collections of Arab poetry.

Philip spared no expense in preparing a suitable home for his literary treasures, and El Escorial's design and decor have been imitated by royal libraries ever since. The main entrance, situated near the cavernous Court of Kings, has a facade fashioned from fine, hand-carved woods. Lining the walls of each room are bookshelves designed in the Tuscan style

Books stand upright, with the pages, whose edges have been treated with golden dye. facing outwards. The pages display the meticulously printed titles of each book and the whole effect produces warm tones of subtle brilliance. Perhaps to discourage idle browsers with suspect motives, forbidden texts have always been placed on the highest shelves.

Philip II established a trust in 1573 and the sums were increased by his successors, with the intention of making the library Europe's finest in number and quality of books. But much of the money was squandered and in 1671 a fire lasting 15 days destroyed more than 3,000 manuscripts and printed volumes. The library suffered again during the Napoleonic invasion and the Spanish Civil War. Nevertheless, a marvelous collection of about 50,000 books and 4,000 manuscripts awaits visitors.

To take advantage of this literary wealth, walk down the corridor leading from the library's rear exit. Off to the right is a spacious room filled with woodeo tables where scholars pore over their chosen volumes. When you enter, the chestnut-robed Augustinian monk in charge may look up with a frown, fearing another stray tourist. But flash any form of indentification to passport is sufficient; no need for a special research card) and he will lead you to the extensive file index, where the choice is

The library of El Escorial is open daily except Sunday, Books must be read on the premises; a plaque hanging above the main entrance threatens excommunication to anyone daring to take books away.

The pine forest and stretches of fine white sand are left behind as the road begins to buck and twist, houncing the driver as he fights with the steering wheel. The road, known officially as the Otto de Plessis Road, suddenly stops in the heart of The Hell, 90 miles (150 kilometers) north of the Garden Route between Port Eliza-

In the context of Thursday's auction at Christie's the "last chance" syndrome worked. The two chairs happily sailed through the sea of unex-pressed doubts, reaching the mind-boggling price of £59,400.
In a sale of medieval art at Sotheby's, also on Thursday, the syndrome was equally effective. The hard core was the collection formed by the late Thomas F. Flannery Jr. of Chicago between 1952 and 1980. nificance of objects mattered as much as their beauty, Flannery bought at a time when getting medieval art was the easiest thing in the world - there were hardly any collectors, and institutions did not compete. According to some sources. Flannery was perhaps too much obsessed with bargains. Compared with those of Adolphe Stociet and Ernst Kofler Truniger, his possessions were negligible. But by today's standards, they almost looked like a hoard. The collection was certainly written up as such in the U.S.

media. And, on Thursday, the U.S. museum establishment was present or represented. The beginning, however, was a hit sticky. What is probably the shabbiest Italian cener of the 13th century I have seen in a long time — a big piece is missing at the top — sold for £825. A supposedly "fine and rare German aquamanile or fireblowing aeolipile" — in plain English a bronze head, exact destination uncertain — beat an undignified re-treat as it failed to sell at £15,000. which, professional souces say. Then came some remarkable lots and everything changed. The glowing atmosphere was established. The Martin d'Arcy Gal-lery, a museum founded in 1969 as part of Lovola University of Chicago, acquired several lots -- not surgly. The director, the Reverend Donald F. Rowe, knew Flannery well and cataloged the collection for him. His choice was an early 16th-century boxwood group of the Virgin and Child from southern Germany at £49,500, a rare polyptych combining a Flemish painting and a German carved group at £41,800, and several lesser lots.

Can Art Match the Reality of Apartheid?

By Michael Gibson tional Herald Tribune

D ARIS — The organization of anger is a difficult undertaking. This is something that every artist who decides to voice rage or indignation is bound to come up against and it is the obvious lesson of an exhibition like "Art Against Apart-

Fighty-five artists from Europe, Africa, Asia and the Americas have responded to the invitation of "Artists of the World Against Apartheid," and so have a number of writers including Jorge Amado, Michel Butor, Allen Ginsberg, Edmond Jabès and Michel Leiris, the works collected and displayed will in time constitute a permanent "Museum Against Apartheid." The venture is supported by the United Nations, but the initiative came from the artists. Artists who have contributed to the show include some of the foremost painters and sculptors of the day, among them Magdalena Aba-kanowicz, Carl Andre, Arman, Don Judd. Wifredo Lam. Louis Le Brocquy, Roy Lichtenstein, Roberto Matta, Robert Motherwell, Tom Phillips, Robert Rauschen-berg, Pierre Soulages, Antoni Tàpies and Zao Wou-ki. Many of these have contributed works characteristic of their style and preoccupations, while others have ventured to deal in one way or another with the subject.

The catalog mentions Picasso's 'Guernica" as a model for this sort of work, and this calls for some comment. "Guernica" is probably Picasso's most passionate work because it expresses a sweeping fury and applies the artist's consideremotion at hand, one that touched deep emotions in Picasso because this bappened in Spain. But Picasso also gave a sort of universal and ies of tortured men (Cremonini). propheuc quality to the expression of his feeling and "Guernica" has stand what the black experience in become a symbolic and sacramental work in Spain today.

Most of us do not know what such a reality actually means - and those who do are, to a sense, left speechless by the experience. Apartheid poses somewhat the same problem. Most of the artists have no direct knowledge or experience of its reality and their indignation is of an abstract nature. When Goya did "The Disasters of War" he was giving ex-

This, at least, is the impression one acquires after visiting an erudite jumble of a show at the Grand Palais, "Rapha-

his graceful tenderness, the natural engravings). But the experience of quality of the attitudes his subjects apartheid is buried in the silence of take, the rightness of the feelings they express. We still sense these qualities up to a point, and even The reality of apartbeid today it is as though Raphael had given their most perfect expression to specific Italian qualities: a sensual tenderness, a love of children, with a barbed wire crown on his a warm appreciation of native

> Raphael offered Italy its ideal mirror —an ideal that did not seem too difficult to identify, being full of mildness and gentle affection. This is the surface, of course. If we examine things more totently we will find a strong platonic influence in these ideal Christian visions. And yet it could seem as though the buman and the divine were for the first time quite intimately blended, without any monumental distance or hieratic stiffness in these works. Raphael's Virgin and Child have a cozy warinth and familiarity — and this is what; in time, was to deprive the work of his imitators of all the studied to reproduce Raphael's at-titudes, not the fresh authenicity that gives them life. As a result his latent faults were stewed in academic juices over the centuries until what remained was no more than an abominable distillate. It is surprising that the exhibition, which carries its effort at comparison all the way to Dali and Cieslewicz, did not make a place for the final degradation of all Raphael stands for and which appears in the ghastly plaster Yugins and Sacred Hearts of the 19th century's commercialized religions art.

MENEUAL SECTION

As may be guessed, then, the show mostly includes works that are grimly derivative: Ingres's Le Serment de Louis XIII, for instance, which, compared to any of the works it tried to emulate, is out a friend pastiche. The true revels tion of the show is the very intenmyth that Raphael personified for the art world of the 19th centu Not only did artists want to pai like Raphael, they also produced considerable number of cloying works in which they expressed their witless daydreams about their Fragonard shows the preity young artist setting his model in the right pose. Horace Vernet has him painting in the Vatican courtyard surrounded by a breathless throng of admirers. Pierre-Nolasque Bergeret, in a painting bought (predictably enough) by Napoleon III, shows the livid corpse of Raphad surrounded by various prelates and artists (among them Michelangelo and Perugino) while the distressed pope strews flower petals over him.

The surprising result of Rapha-ers innocations has both that with his contemporaries admired has been perverted — the "natural" quality of his attitudes has been turned to preposterous attitudinizing, the "grace" to pose, the warmth to frigidity and the work overall has been laboriously transmuted to outrageous kitsch.

Other shows on the quinquecentennial of Raphael's birth include "Antour de Raphael," drawings and paintings, at the Pavillon de Flore of the Louvre, and "Raphad au Musée Condé," Château de Chantilly, both to Feb. 13.

"Raphael and French Art," Grand Palais, Paris 8, to Feb. 13.

The Cathedral of York's Man of Glass

By Ginny Turner International Herald Tribune

ORK, England - York Min-York, 500 years old and the largest Gothic cathedral in England. Peter Gibson probably knows more of its intimate details than anyone in the Most of the windows were removed and hidden for safekeeping during World War II, a process which took two years. Putting them back, however, took 22 years. Restoration through centuries had jumbled the panels, and pieces of improper era and color distorted the illustrations in the glass. In 1943, it came to the attention of the Very Reverend Eric Milner-White, dean of York Minster, who had n keen personal interest in his-toric glass. He asked to see a few small panels, then more, and was disappointed to see the scrambled jigsaw they had become. The dean then began the great Minster glass restoration in a modest way, supervising two glaziers to rearrange the glass to restore the stories the Minster windows told. This is where Gibson came in. Milner-White knew Gibson as an workshop, as well as two buge bouks on glass to look over. "He suggested I come in on Monday morning to try the work out." Gib-

Gibson went on to become superintendent of York Glaziers Trust and an authority whose 120 lectures a year are booked almost two years in advance. He regularly travels all over England to photograph and assess ecclesiastical glass, but the Minster is Gibson's first love. His office is on one side of it, his home on the other. "The beauty of York Minster is sented is every period of glass painting — a complete commen-tary on English glass painting for comes evident when he walks toto his shop. He pulls open a few of the shallow drawers which hold some ery constituent of a piece of glas 7,000 colored segments currently in the glass bank — pieces removed altar-server. At school graduation from erroneous placements and not in 1945, he gave the 15-year-old a yet repositioned. He picks up a private tour of the restoration piece painted with the head of a from erroneous placements and not tonsured monk. "This one has been here for 28 years. A place to use it in the Minster has not yet been found, but I'm convinced we'll find son recalls, "and I've been trying it a bome for him."

In the shop at this time are three major projects — another Minster window, a sorting of pieces from Coventry Cathedral, and a 19thcentury panel from the priory church at Boulton Abbey. Gibson lifts the panel and places it on a light board to show its colors. He explains that before a restoration is done, a panel is photo-graphed, and its leading recorded on paper with a wax rubbing. A that it has 128 windows, and repre- craftsman then dismandes it, and places the glass segments on their corresponding marks on the sub-bing while they are given an ultrasonic cleaning in a dilute-ammonia bath. Upon reconstruction, any pieces not matching an age or de-sign are replaced with those from the bank.

The craftsman wraps a lead strip around each piece. The design is restored according to the original leading pattern — in consultation with the University of York's medieval studies scholars - and the lead strips soldered together.

"The most exciting thing we're doing, without reservation, is a collaboration with the university's physics department," Gibson says, "In 1972 the Science Research Council gave the university a grant to study the deterioration of glass. mostly because it had this massive amount of glass on the doorstep. We've cooperated very well indeed on pioneer work on how to protect

"There are no mysteries anyery constituent of a piece of glass reads ont on a TV screen. They can even make synthetic medieval glass Restoration of the huge east win-dow, fully the size of a tennis court, took 11 years. But it was work Gibson thrived on. "The top of the great east window is 80 feet above the foor, and pieces at the top are as carefully painted as this saintly monk. Craftsmen did this for the glory of God and didn't care that no one would see it." About the time the massive project was drawing to a close in 1966, York Glaziers Trust was estab-lished, its trustees under the chairmanship of the dean of York. Aided by a grant from the Pilgrim Trust, which funds a variety of restorations throughout England, the old workshop was dismantled and re-equipped for the sole task of restoring medieval glass, for the Minster and any public Christian church in the United Kingdom.

Gibson, after 20 years working on the Minster glass, was made superintendent and secretary of York Glaziers Trust. The workshop has never been busier, with commissions from all over Britain, and now employs four craftsmen and two apprentices.

Upon leaving his workshop, Gibson has a second thought and rums back, "I'll go rescue that tonsured monk - he doesn't like being in that room overnight." Gibson retrieves the 15th-century head and replaces it to a drawer.

"When you can see stained glass like this it's very exciting," he says. "People go into the Minster to see the glass, and it looks splendid, but 999 out of 1,000 never know how extraordinary it really is. I've had the good fortune to see it up close all my life."

Multilateralism crystallised in 1947 in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The GATT signatories—now totaling 89 countries—agreed to a system of cutting tariffs for all nations.

The GATT agreement in 1947 came before regional and ideological countries among nations but forced most nations to take sides.

There is a key difference between the U.S. Israeli plan and the Cambbean Basin Initiative, which was signed into law last summer. The United States will seek reciprocal rights for its exports to Israel.

Washington did not demand similar access for exports to the Caribbean region because those countries are poor and cannot afford to give sions by importing more.

Trade in that case became aid pure and simple, even though the egislation had been stripped of some of its more promising features when number of domestic industries, from textiles to footwear, obtained varyers preventing the duty-free treatment from applying to them. The president's chief economic adviser appeared to believe that Mr. Speakes was talking for other members of the White House staff but

Style, Policy Differences Mark Feldstein's Term

By Peter T. Kilborn New York Times Service

WASHINGTON - Few American economists of his age -44 last week — could have brought as rich a reputation to the chairmanship of the Council of Economic Advisers as Martin S. Feldstein did last year, and few of his predecessors have brought more criticism from his employers in the White House.

The sniping took on an unusually nasty edge Wednesday, generating widespread speculation that Mr. Feldstein would have to resign.

A White House spokesman, Larry M. Speakes, joked about Mr. Feldstein's limited role in policy-making and even mocked the pronounciation of the man's name: "Feld-STINE" which the economist prefers, and "Feld-STEEN," which many members of the White House staff tend to use.

It is differences over tone and style as well as the substance of economic policy that divide Mr. Feldstein from the White House and Donald T, Regan's Treasury Department. All sides agree that federal budget deficits are a problem, and all agree that taxes might have to be raised to lower the deficits.

Mr. Feldstein, however, has been talking more about President Ronald Reagan's cuts in taxes and increases in military spending as parts of the deficit than have other administration officers, and most of the administration wishes he would not. They know the deficits are their Achilles' heel, but they would prefer that he emphasize recovery," said Lawrence A. Kudlow, who was chief economist in the Office of Management and Budget early in the Reagan administration and is now a consultant in Washington. Martin Stuart Feldstein was appointed chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in August, 1982 following the resignation of

Britain Manages to Sell Only 70% of C&W Issue

By Bob Hagerty

LONDON - Demand proved weak in the British government's auction of Cable & Wireless Ple.

The Bank of England reported that applications were received for only 70 percent of the 100 million shares on offer, which represent about 22 percent of the international telecommunications company's shares outstanding.

As a result, the shares will be sold at the minimum hidding price of 275 pence ($4) each, and the underwriters will have to buy 30 percent of the issue.

Bankers and brokers described the result as disappointing rather than disastrous. But some said the outcome should serve as a lesson

As recently as Wednesday, analysts were cheerfully predicting that heavy demand would push the selling price to between 300 and 310 pence a share. A senior official at the merchant bank Kleinwort, Benson Ltd., which arranged the underwriting, said such talk "almost certainly frightened off the stags." - speculators who pounce on attractive share offers in the hope of making quick profits.

The Fed is probably placing primary policy emphasis on the economy instead of monetary aggregates and there is every indication that the economy will end 1983 with a bang, particularly in the consumer-sales area," said David M. Jones, economist at Aubrey G. Lanston & Co.

"Real economic growth could come in at 6-7 percent, substantial-ly above the 4 percent level desired by the Fed," Mr. Jones said. "The Fed is a little worried and consequently has tightened pressure on

This was indicated by the $174million net-borrowed-reserves fig-ure announced by the Fed in its weekly report. The net-borrowed-reserve position — free reserves is the opposite position—means that the Fed has pulled back on bank reserves, forcing banks to borrow money from the Fed to meet their requirements.

Factory Orders Up 0.7% in U.S.

WASHINGTON - Orders for U.S. factories rose 0.7 percent in October from September, with the aircraft industry making up for setbacks in machinery and metals, the Commerce Department said Friday.

The increase was the smallest since July's 1.7-percent decline but the orders were enough to take the month's level of incoming business to a record $182.2 billion after seasonal adjust-ment. Mr. Keck's move was disclosed Thursday a he and Superior, one of the largest independent U.S. oil companies, announced a series of negures and countermeasures. Before the lens was made public, the Superior board said it has adopted a change in its bylaws that would make it more difficult for Mr. Keck to win a proper battle. Mr. Keck immediately said, through his attorneys, that he would challenge the change is court. court.

The new bylaw stipulates that if a dissident shareholder seeks the support of others in a proxy fight, eligible voting shares may not be counted until 15 days after the dissident's pipposal is made. Because Superior has amounted a record date of this Monday for the issuance of its new preferred shares, a vote on Mr. Keels proposal could not be taken until after the neshares were issued. proposal could not be taken until after these shares were issued.

In a filing with the Securities and Exchant Commission, Mr. Keck said he did not intense seek control of Superior or oust any of its bounders. Last month, through the New Yor securities firm Dillon, Read & Co., Mr. Ket told the SEC that he was seeking a buyer forth Superior shares that he courtols, and that your of those shares would be "chlanced they were sold as part of a takenyer.

BHP Set to Expand Abroad in GE Pact

By Brian Timms

MELBOURNE' - Australia's largest company, Broken Hill Pro-prietary, is preparing to diversify and become a stronger internation-al force by way of the biggest take-over agreement in the country's history.

After almost a year of negotiations, BHP is on the verge of acquiring the Utah Group, a subsidiary of General Electric Co. of the United States. The transaction is expected to be completed in April

The Utah Group — Utah International and Utah Marcona — has large coking coal interests in Australia, but BHP's sights are set mainly on its mineral projects abroad BHP's persistence on the acquisition in the face of difficulties showed an eagerness to diversify from its historic reliance on steel-making, a sector in which it suffered a net loss of $130 million in the year that ended May 31. Negotiations started last year when BHP announced a $2.4-billion bid for Utah. GE was willing to sell as part of its plan to concen-trate on high technology. 1983, for completion of an agreement under which BHP would pay about $700 million for most of Utah's non-Australian assets. BHP would line up partners for a consortium to acquire the Australian assets — five big open-cut coal mines in the state of Queensland. But this coincided with a slump McNeill, said the transaction be- nounced came as difficult as "buying straw had been expected early this month, the sources said, adding that the delay did not mean any difficulty was being made by lending banks in Japan, the United States, Canada, Western Europe and Australia

Another factor is that BHP, which with 55,000 workers is the country's biggest employer, has simply grown too big for Australia. "In Australia, when a company like BHP invests in a major way in a business or project, it tends to get locked into that project," Mr. Adam said. "There is a level of economic nationalism within Australia which makes it difficult for an Australia command to cell to a

W. German Joblessness Up Slightly; Labor Aide Blames Seasonal Factors

NUREMBERG (AP) — West German unemployment increased slightly in November, to 2.193 million people or 8.8 percent of the work force, from 2.147 million or 8.7 percent in October, the Federal Labor Office said Friday. Unemployment in November 1982 was 8.4 percent. Josef Stingl. president of the Federal Labor Office, termed the increase minor and said it was due largely to seasonal factors in construction and tourism. In past years seasonal factors have influenced unemployment by as much as 120,000 during similar periods, be said.

West German production in recent months has been better than projected, particularly in the automotive and chemical sectors. Chancel for Helmut Kohl recently forecast a 2.5-percent increase in gross nations

The Labor Office reported 67,059 job openings in November, down 7.3 percent from October but up 9 percent from November 1982. The agency said 493,964 workers were put on short shifts, down 9.9 percent from October and 52.2 percent from November 1982.

Iraq Official Suggests Oil-Price Freeze

BAHRAIN (AP) — Iraq's oil minister, Qassem Ahmed Taki Urabi, was quoted Friday as advocating a price freeze through 1984 and perhaps 1985. Mr. Urabi said in a Gulf News Agency interview that prices were 1985. Mr. Urabi said in a Gulf News Agency interview that prices were now "balanced."

"If any increase takes place in the future it will not be a big one so that the price continues to remain competitive with the other alternative energy sources," be was quoted as saying.

Iraq is a member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which in March cut its prices and imposed a production ceiling because of a glut on the world market. Like other OPEC ministers, who are preparing for a meeting Wednesday in Geneva Mr. Urabi predicted a are preparing for a meeting Wednesday in Geneva, Mr. Urabi predicted a rise in demand in 1984 and said this could prompt OPEC to raise its

Standard Seeks to Join Bank Group

LONDON (Reuters) — Standard Chartered Bank Plc, said Friday that it had applied to become a member of the Bankers' Clearing House.

Ten banks, including the Bank of England, are now members and can clear checks and other paper with one another. Citibank NA applied to become a member last month. Banks that are not members clear their paper by using a member as an agent.

Standard Chartered said it was Britain's fifth-largest bank, with assets

The previously announced projects involve two modern continuous casters capable of making 5.1 million tons of steel a year. The consortium includes Morgan Guranty Trust Co., Chemical Bank and Bankers Trust Co. as leaders; seven other U.S. and Canadian banks, including Citibank and Chase Manhattan, Mellon Bank, Philadelphia National and the Bank of Nova Scotia; seven Austrian banks, and Voesta-Alpine AG of Austria, which is supplying the casters.

The arrangement provides for the consortium to finance and to own the land and equipment, officials said. They said Bethlehem would pay according to bow much steel is produced. Robert C. Wilkins, vice president for finance, said the "toll payments" would end after 15 years and Bethlehem could then buy the equipment at a fixed price.

3 More Oil Companies Sign in China

BELIING (AP) — Texaco Inc., Standard Oil Co. of California and Agip SpA of Italy signed Friday what were expected to be the last major contracts in China's first round of bidding for offsbore oil-exploration

Texaco and Standard Oil of California became the first U.S. companies to be granted exploration rights in both the basin of the Pearl River mouth and in the South Yellow Sea, considered a higher-risk area. Alfred C. Decrane, president of Texaco, said it and Standard Oil expected to spend at least $100 million on exploration in the two blocks in the next three years. Texaco, Standard Oil and Agip each have a one-third share in explorations in the Pearl basin and Texaco and Standard Oil each have half of the South Yellow Sea rights.

Ford Reported Eying Mexico Venture DEARBORN, Michigan (UPI) — Ford Motor Co. may soon approve

a $400-million project to build small cars in Mexico using parts from Japan, the Detroit Free Press reported Friday. It said the plan could cost thousands of American jobs.

The newspaper said Ford would build as many as 200,000 cars a year, beginning in 1987, at a new plant in Hermosillo, about 250 miles (400 kilometers) south of Tucson, Arizona. Major parts, such as engines and transmissions, would come from Toyo Kogyo, which builds Mazda vehicles and is 25-percent owned by Ford.

building a subcompact in Mexico "that would meet the needs of the Mexican market and other export markets," including the United States.

Federal Officials Investigating Antitrust Side of Football Draft

By Robert D. Hershey Jr. New York Times Service

WASHINGTON — Federal antitrust officials have begun an investigation into professional football's four-year rule denying college players the chance of a professional career until their collegiate eligibility has been exhausted.

The investigation, should it lead the investigation, should it lead in an outlawing of agreements by the professional leagues to avoid recruiting undergraduates, could have far-reaching economic effects on both college and professional football, as well as on the players themselves.

The Federal Trade Commission which shares responsibility for administering the antitrust laws with the Justice Department, has sent letters to the National Football League and the year-old United States Football League requesting voluntary cooperation in an investigation to determine whether the four-year rule can be justified.

The rule, which dates back half a century in the case of the NFL, is similar in its effect to those in basketball and hockey that have been struck down by the courts over the last several years. Among other things, the rule has acted to reduce competition be-tween the two leagues for players while guaranteeing that college and universities, many of which rely on football revenue to support entire athletic programs, would oot prematurely lose stars.

Though he has a statement to take himself rather a bit too seriously and is given to excessively self-conscious bouts of introspection, Dryden amply conveys to those of us not privileged to have known it a sense of what life in "the game" is like. He describes it with clarity and affection, and a most welcome awareness that its importance, though oot for a moment to be underestimated, is limited and

T HERE'S a strong argument, as many an ice hockey fan will tell you, that Ken Dryden was the most skilled and accomplished goalie in the history of the game. He played for the Montreal Canadiens from 1971 through 1979 — missing one season because of a contract dispute — and compiled a dounting list of accomplishments: In the eight seasons he played, the Canadiens won the National Hockey League's Stanley Cup six times; he won the Vezina Trophy, as the league's leading goalie, five times; be was inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame two months ago.

But Dryden was, and is, more than just a splendidly gifted athlete. He is an alumnus of an lvy League university (Cornell) and bolds a law degree from McGill University; he once spent a sur between hockey seasons working for Ralph Nader's "Raiders" in Washington; he has been active in Canadian public affairs and like Bill Bradley, the senator from New Jersey and former basketball player to whom he is often compared, he may well be headed for a political career. Now he is the author - and on all the evidence the sole author - of a memoir of his life in hockey, some readers may find, as Dryden's publisher does, that "The Game" is comparable in tone and quality to Bradley's own memoir, "Life oo the Run."

covering several days in Dryden's life toward the end of the 1978-79 season. He was 31 years old and by then had made the decision to retire at the end of that season, win or lose. The truth was that he thought the Canadiens would lose: "We bave won too often, for too long. We know every signal, every sign, we see our demise in everything we do." The team seemed to be struggling, to be on the verge of turning the league over to the rising New York Islanders; after seven full years with what some considered the best team ever to take the ice, Dryden sensed that its peak and his own had been passed, that it was time to move on to the rest of the business of his life.

As the days of this memoir elapse. Dryden moves back and forth io time to recall his career and to discuss a number of matters of interest. He writes about the camaraderie of the locker room, about the pleasures and frustrations of life on the road, about the rhythms of practice, about the chemistry that makes up a team; he paints portraits of his coach, of a number of his teammates and opponents and of that this isn't really the NHL; that I am the victim of a wonderful, cruel hoax, and that some day, today, ow, it will end."

Dryden also writes about more serious matters. He regrets the way in which big money "moved froot and center" in hockey in the 1970s and the way it became a "cause of great bitterness and division" in his own life. He laments the "special treatment" that athletes receive, even as be confess-We do exciting, sometimes courageous, sometimes ennobling things like heroes do, but oo more than anyone else does." Of the violence tolerated by the game's hierarchy be says: "What matters is that fighting degrades, turning sport to dubious specta-cle, bringing into question bookey's very legitimacy, confining it forever to the fringes of sports respect-ability. Yet sharp though his criticisms can be, he knows that his participation in "the game" was a privilege:

privilege: The game was different, something that behere, slouched back, mellow, when I hear others talk of 'the game,' I know what [a former player] meant. It is bockey that I'm leaving behind. It's 'the game' I'll miss."
